

Last week we stayed in Madrid for four days.

On the second day, after lunch, Carolina and I went to the National Library, which was a great experience, then, we went to the Reina Sofia Museum, where we saw the Guernika, by Pablo Picasso.

While all the group was in Retiro park, we went to the Library, as I said before, where we watched an amazing exposition about Miguel de Cervantes. Most of the information there was new for me. It helped me to improve my culture and learn more about classical authors and great books as El Quijote.

That this exposition was ok, was perfect for me, because there were a lot of things (papers and photographs) that helped me to understand Cervantes' whole life easily.

When we finished watching that exposition we ran to the Reina Sofia Museum. By mistake, we arrived too early, but never mind, we entered in the cafeteria and relaxed for a while.

We got in the museum. I was pretty exciting about that, because I couldn't imagine that one day I'll see the Guernika. It was so enormous that I was really shocked. It perfectly reflects the war. Although I couldn't imagine the terrifying situation. At least I could keep the calm and did the social dossier.

In conclusion, I loved both activities. But because I made inquiries, I really enjoyed the exposition about Cervantes, where I learnt lots of things about it. I recommend everybody to go, ensuring that it's a great experience. And it also like me the Guernika. Not all days you could see this painting. By chance I get inspired and I wrote some of my texts there in Madrid. Because both the exposition and the painting caused in me some feelings.
